Custom Witing

Agree, it is unpleasant, reading an interesting book, to stumble over errors in spelling or punctuation. If there are many such errors, the reading experience will be spoiled, no matter how wonderful the book is. That's why publishers have editors and proofreaders check the book before it comes out.
But what should a samizdat author without a proofreader do? Use special programs and online services.
Where to start?
We recommend writing books in the editor MS Word or its analogues. In addition to convenient work with the structure of the text, these editors have a built-in check of spelling and punctuation. True, each text editor has its own vocabulary, so what one editor considers a mistake, the other will not notice.
